

CERTIFICATE OF ANALYSIS
PRE-WORKOUT POWDER

LOT NO.: 24C0812
DATE: 12 MAR 2026

TEST	SPECIFICATION	RESULT	STATUS
L-Citrulline Malate	8.0 g/serving	8.02 g	PASS
Beta-Alanine	4.0 g/serving	4.01 g	PASS
Betaine Anhydrous	2.5 g/serving	2.51 g	PASS
Heavy Metals	NMT 10 ppm	<10 ppm	PASS
Lead	NMT 0.5 ppm	<0.5 ppm	PASS
Total Plate Count	NMT 1000 cfu/g	<100 cfu/g	PASS
Yeast & Mold	NMT 100 cfu/g	<10 cfu/g	PASS
Salmonella	Negative/10g	Negative	PASS

APPROVED BY:

Your product works.

Getting a stranger to believe it is a different job.

“Hold your supplements
to a higher standard.
Clean ingredients.
Transparent labels.”

Here’s what their customers actually say.

“It tastes just like chocolate ice cream.”

“Mixes easy.”

“So delicious.”

“An accredited lab.”

Not the lab. An accredited lab.

Every competitor your customer checks on the same Friday already prints an accredited lab too.

Every single number,
printed.

8 g L-citrulline malate

4 g beta-alanine

2,500 mg betaine

They paid for a formula.

Their customers bought a flavor.

The company is winning. The brand stays swappable with something half as good.

Let your hero be the numbers.

Eight grams. On a photo. One sentence underneath.

Your competitor's hero becomes a comparison the moment yours is a number.

“An accredited lab”
costs you nothing to say.

“LightLabs” costs you authority when you don’t.

One sentence and one logo on your testing page. That’s the difference between a promise and a receipt.

“No digestive issues.”

“Absorbs quickly.”

“Helps with my recovery.”

Tie each one back to a printed number.
The claim stays factual. The dose does the persuading. The language stays theirs.

Dose disclosure is a fact about the product, not a health claim.

Pair a printed dose with a promised outcome and you're in structure/function territory — you need the evidence behind it.

Keep the dose factual. Let the reader draw the conclusion.

This isn't a supplement problem.

It's what happens when your real advantage is a number and your marketing is a mood.

If your product actually works and nobody can tell —

DM PROOF